

Repeat jab against coronavirus

Coronavirus has not gone away yet. People are still falling ill with it.

A coronavirus jab will provide you with protection against the virus for some time.

You have probably been vaccinated against it a couple of times already. You will have received the jab in your upper arm.

The protection that the jab provides wears off after a while. Which is why you are being offered a booster jab.

Getting your booster jab against the coronavirus will top up your protection once more.

The booster jab should keep any symptoms mild and prevent you from ending up in hospital because of the coronavirus.

If you and many other people remain healthy, this will enable hospital staff to concentrate on helping other people who are ill.

And if lots of people are healthy, this will ensure that trains can keep running and schools, restaurants and cafés can stay open, for instance.

Some people will receive an invitation get their booster jab. Others can find out online or in newspapers when they will be eligible for the jab.

The booster jab is entirely voluntary. The jab is free of charge

You should continue to follow the advice even after having your booster jab, i.e. stay at home if you have symptoms of Covid-19 and test yourself using a home testing kit. Wash your hands regularly and open a window for a while each day.
